"THE ANGELUS."

The return of "The Angelus" to France purely speculative. The disposition of this election? celebrated painting in Paris, when it besense of mortification in France. Now it is about to return to that country.

JEAN FRANCOIS MILLET is recognized to day as one of the greatest, if not absolutely him starve during his life, and now thousands are paid for his canvases.

And yet, after this wild exultation on our part over the acquisition of this peerless work of art, it is to be returned to France, after several months here in which and there is scarcely interest enough felt to ask the reason why.

The true story of "The Angelus" might furnish matter for thought. It arrived here amid clamor and chuckling pride. RAPID TRANSIT.

Every half measure of relief in the matter of rapid transit for New York is an affront as well as an aggravation. Rapid transit is the passage from one point to another with celerity. In a city built like this thousands of citizens live miles from the neighborhood in which they transact their Mally business. They must pass from their residences to their offices and shops expeditionsly or their patience and their interestr

It is strange that such a need, so univer sal, so imperative, so born of conditions which admit of no other solution, should seek alleviation and have such difficulty and wearing delay in obtaining it. The people want it. Who or what is it that withstands the people's claim?

Is it not time that something should be done? Or is it the melancholy fact that an insignificant minority figuring as a clique with a pull can insolently withstand such a popular demand? The people should see

To court death rather than endure a life stripped of luxuries is the insensate exaltation of the feeling which makes a cat purr contentedly in the warmth of the fireside, and is unworthy a man.

PAITH IN THE LYMPH.

Several trustworthy physicians have openly expressed doubt as to the value of Dr. Kocn's alleged cure for consumption. They argue that after three months of experiments with the lymph something definite should be known about it. They say that the results obtained are not more 'favorable than unfavorable, and several sof them declare they will not use a licament whose violent reactionary force has been demonstrated and of whose composition they are ignorant. Certainly every human being ought to have wished coess to the lymph, but too great pru dence in its use or its praise cannot be had

A like circumstance is reported to have occurred in Dorsetshire in 1588. A field of over three acres in extent at Blackmore moved bodily a distance of some five hundred yards. The trees and teness upon it were but little disturbed, but it knocked down a church and sundry dwellings on another field, crossing the high road to Herne, blocking it up and there it stayed.

CRABS' EYES AS MEDICINE. Said to Be an Excellent Remedy for Crabs' eyes are employed to some extent as a remedy for acid stomachs, says the Chicago Times. They are not actually the eyes of the crab, but simply small concretions of lime found in the stomachs of crayfish at the time when they are about to cast their shell and make new ones.

"It is supposed that these concretions are designed by nature to provide material for the new shells. At all events, having

They laughed and said anyboov could win, urging Evans, (the granger), to play, but Evans wanted to find the old man. He wanted a job and didn't care to play.

After finding that he could not be worked all three went downstairs to find the farmer who was to employ the stranger. When on the street Evans threw back his coat and, showing his star, arrested them with the suddenness of the defeat of the heavy villain and his pal in the popular verising.

The pulverized shells are placed in solution in water, the heavier and coarser particles falling to the bottom.

By pouring off the solution thus obtained and permitting it to precipitate such fine particles of lime as it still retains, an exceedingly refined deposit is at length secured.
